HOW IT'S BUILT

One quote per row, four axes, six criteria

Quotes are verbatim from a corpus of 3,491 YouTube comments (~620,000 characters). They are trimmed for length only — no wording is changed, though adjacent sentences from a single comment may be joined. Anything that couldn't clear three criteria was moved to Below the bar rather than quietly dropped.

These 16 lines are among the loudest in the corpus but they clear only two criteria. That is a finding, not an oversight: the FDA, authority and dose-math arguments are ideological or arithmetic rather than sensory and personal. They have no body in them and no former self to compare against.

Which tells you exactly how to use them — they make excellent hooks and headlines, and terrible testimonials. Put them at the top of an ad, never in a customer's mouth.

| “Just take niacin, dude.”                                 | ANGER   | Reductionist | Hook only — no lived detail to anchor a testimonial        |
| “NMN and NR are extremely expensive sources of plain B3.” | ANGER   | Reductionist | Hook / headline; answer it with the flush quotes above     |
| “Your bottle says 250mg. He takes a gram.”                | ANGER   | Reductionist | Dose-math hook; pair with a cost-per-gram table            |

BEFORE YOU RUN ANY OF IT

Claim guardrail

STRUCTURE AND FUNCTION ONLY

Several quotes in the source corpus describe reversing Alzheimer's, resolving lung scarring and curing arthritis. Those are excluded from this bank on purpose — running them turns a supplement into an unapproved drug claim.

Everything here stays inside structure/function language: supports cellular energy, supports healthy NAD+ levels, supports healthy aging. Keep the raw review, the date and the customer’s consent on file for anything you run as an ad, and screen creator scripts the same way — a claim your creator makes is your claim.
